South Carolina stood at the forefront of agitation for secession in the runup to Civil War. After the initiation of military hostilities in Charleston harbor, its most prominent citizens professed that their slaves were loyal and insisted that they would face no challenge from the state’s black majority.

This talk will focus on the great paradox of a war which was initiated to safeguard the institution of slavery but which ended up destroying the social order it aimed to defend.